To whom it may concern

Although Stefan Simtea has been here for a couple of years, his self-committment and positive attitude to learning new things have already been remarked. At the first sight, Stefan looks rather introvert but his passion for acquiring new language items and new conversational techniques is helping him with becoming quite popular in his small linguistic community. His tremendous effort and progress have made him one of my favourite students from our language center.

Being also fond of extensive reading and documentary films on the world history and future has been decisive to modelling him as a quite knowledgeable young man for his young age. His excellent expertise in computers, science in general, modern English literature and old civilisations is making him a remarkable debator and advocate of the human rights around the world. All these hobbies complete his friendly attitude, his volunteering activities of civil or social rights. When it comes to helping the elders, collecting funds for the orphanages or keeping the town clean, Stefan will be among the first on the list. But Stefan is also highly ranked when he is in the posture of a team worker, annalyst or interpreter for the volunteering foreign groups coming to Romania.

Apart from the top marks he gets at all subjects, the same high stakes have been touched when he competed into computer abilities, school olympiads, speaking contests or general culture tests.

I can see Stefan as one of the top researchers in a science laboratory or a genuine inventor in computer techniques, a scientist with a vast humanitarian resource. As a student, he can meet the requirements of the best universities around the world. In fact, he is the ideal type of student for any respectable teacher: intelligent, modest, hard-working, spontaneous, inventive, tolerant, helpful and efficient.

I will be happy to offer any extra information in your decision making process.

Sincerely,
Radu Alexandrescu. M.Ed. teacher
